Abstract

Economic transformation has been gaining ground in the former socialist countries of Central and Eastern Europe since the change of system. This descriptive paper explores the locational patterns of enterprise in the Vilnius urban region during the post-communist transition of Lithuania. Cartographical techniques are used to map the changes that took place between 1994 and 2011. The results show a sharp increase in the number of enterprises in the urban core and a very modest increase outside this zone. However, the maps reveal divergent locational patterns for different sectors of the urban economy.

Introduction

Major political, economic and social changes have been taking place in the former socialist countries of Central and Eastern Europe (CEE) since the early 1990s (Hamilton et al. 2005; Smith & Timár 2010). The significant impact of these changes has been made possible by the transition from the Soviet command economy model to a market-led neo-liberal economy. In addition, the rapid technological, economic and social progress that has accompanied the processes of urbanization, globalization and regionalization has further reinforced the on-going transformation. All of these conditions have resulted in large-scale changes in the spatial-economic landscape of the CEE countries during the past
