Abstract

The policy tools of counter-terrorism reflect both the nature of the terrorist group in question and the strategies of the actors that engage in counter-terrorism. Historically governments have perceived terrorism primarily as a crime, a threat to the state's security, or part of a broader political campaign. Accordingly, states have adopted counter-terrorism policies based on law enforcement, military or diplomatic strategies, or a combination of these. While international organisations have played a supplementary role in terms of law enforcement and diplomacy, NGOs have, until recently, played a much smaller role in this field. Over the last couple of decades, however, with the rise of 'sacred terror' and as many states have accorded more weight to the
