Joining Isn't Everything

Exit, Voice, and Loyalty in Party Organizations

EMILIE VAN HAUTE

European political parties have been recruiting members for over a century. However, "parties without partisans" are now conceivable (Dalton and Wattenberg 2000). Clearly, parties are changing, whether they are mutating, adapting, or declining. This makes the study of party membership and its mechanisms, processes, and evolutions crucial. Besides, party membership is at the crossroads of two prolific fields in political science (party organizations and political participation). One would therefore expect to find an abundant literature on the topic. However, until recently, scholars have not devoted much attention to this phenomenon (van Haute 2009a).

The first developments concerned the general decline in party memberships, framed in the thesis of party decline. In return, this has made who joins political organizations a question commanding considerable attention. The work of Seyd and Whiteley is a turning point in this respect (Seyd and Whiteley 1992; Whiteley, Seyd and Richardson 1994). Since then, several scholars and teams have performed the same type of micro-level analysis in their national contexts.¹ Most of this literature is rather descriptive, with an emphasis on the socio-demographic and political profile of the respondents. When turning analytical, the literature is rooted mainly in the work on models of political participation: the resource model (Verba, Nie, and Kim 1978), the socio-psychological model (Finkel, Muller, and Opp 1989), and the rational choice model (Whiteley and Seyd 1996).
